

Lisa Puglisi, MD

Lisa Puglisi, MD is a general internist and addiction medicine specialist who is focused on the health of individuals with a history of incarceration. For the past five years, she has directed a primary care-based program in New Haven that focuses on post incarceration care, Transitions Clinic-New Haven, which is part of a network of a broader national network, the Transitions Clinic Network, www.transitionsclinic.org. The crux of the Transitions Clinic model is working with community health workers who have themselves been previously incarcerated, to assist people recently released from incarceration in engaging with the health system and addressing their myriad social needs. Dr. Puglisi is currently leading a state-wide expansion of Transitions Clinic programs to the communities in CT most affected by incarceration. She is an Assistant Professor of Medicine at Yale University School of Medicine and she received her undergraduate degree from Tufts University, medical degree from Albert Einstein College of Medicine and pursued medical residency training at Yale New Haven Hospital.
